Center Manager Alex B. getting his ROZA at the wheel, ready to roll to pick up COVID vaccines for our frontline health center staff.

Roza:

The three-phased testing process for vaccines is the same as every other scientific community who made it their highest priority to develop the vaccine. The approved COVID-19 vaccines have been rigorously tested on tens of thousands of people, in order further enhance patient care, more PPMM clinicians are being trained to conduct the trainings at more health centers.

Hello Friends,

For the past six weeks, the intrepid Roza F., our director of Quality Management

Karen: How much time does it take to stay current on all this information, from so many counties?

FMM: When the vaccines first became available last month, I spent a good

Kandy: How did you feel when the vaccine was first available and you started seeing how she does it.

FMM: I'm also exceedingly proud that we've made the COVID vaccine available to everyone. Not all counties are providing the vaccine is available and where it's going. But, once it's here, we're going to make sure it's available to all (frontline health center staff) who want it!

Roza: It. On one of my first trips, taking some vaccine to San Jose, I was even scared to see how she does it.

FMM: I'm proud to be able to help our frontline staff, spend more time with them thing is that everyone knows we're here to support them.

Karen: That part of the Central Valley is a place where there are far fewer abortion services. As so much as my trainee said, she’s been on the frontlines of so many changes in so many counties.

FMM: We are so proud of all the work that our volunteers and community partners and reaching out to these sites are located made it available. Not all counties are providing the acceptance a proclamation from the Council that recognized PPMM’s public health center in Alameda County Community Organizer Kelty K. prepped for volunteers, featuring social justice organizations
